He was awarded the Bronze Star for taking an artillery gun up a hill in front of the Japanese lines on Cape Gloucester. The following account, "Suicide Creek" was written by Sergeant Asa Bordages and published in the May 26 and June 2, 1945 issues of Collier's. The Marines were attacking Aogiri Ridge on January 8, 1944. "Meanwhile, (Lt. Col Lewis W.) Walt had called back for a 37-mm. fieldpiece. It was held up back in the jungle somewhere behind the battalion until an artilleryman from the 11th Marines said he might get the gun through with a caterpillar tractor. There was only one way he could go. For fifty yards or more that way ran right along the front line. It was through heavy mud; slow going. And he would be completely exposed to the enemy's fire. They told him that but Pfc. Ellery Everett Marvell said he'd give it a go. The battle was at a furious pitch as he came clattering along the front, perched high on the driver's seat of the tractor, perched like a hen on a roost, the plainest target a man could have, with the whole enemy line blazing at him. Bullets banged on the cat, on the gun, and bullets hit within inches of him, but by crazy luck "that marvel Marvell" wasn't hit. He swung in at last at battalion headquarters. He lighted a cigarette. "Here it is" he said. "Where do you want her?" They told him the spot on the line. He said "Okay" and trundled off to deliver the gun. Then he swung homeward. They figured he was a dead man for sure. He'd made it once, a million-to-one shot, and at those odds you don't repeat. Again bullets banged and clattered against the ambling cat. Hundreds of bullets spitting past the driver's head. But the long shot came through again. It was plain impossible, but he didn't get a scratch." He was discharged on November 10, 1945, as a Private First Class his rate of pay was fifty-six dollars and thirty-five cents a month.
